WASHINGTON—House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-WI) released the following statement after President Trump announced there would be no summit with North Korea next month:

“The North Korean regime has long given ample reason to question its commitment to stability. We must continue to work with our allies toward a peaceful resolution, but that will require a much greater degree of seriousness from the Kim regime. At the same time, Congress has provided significant tools to hold North Korea accountable, and it is important that the United States not relent in this maximum pressure campaign.”
